

narrative or methodology like the inner monologue, we see exactly how Raskolnikov from quiet student became a paranoid of disrupted nerve. And his inner monoliths just lead us to another dimension of this novel, which is a novel idea or a philosophical novel. Following the Raskolnikov's thoughts, we find no unusual development of an idea, but an integral discussion in his head. So often when we talk about 'Crime and Punishment' we are talking about an internal dialogue that 150 years ago opened some of the topics we are still discussing today.

If Raskolnikov could argue with himself, we can argue with Raskolnikov and his ideas. Better if we use his own words, or if we quote. One of the most well-known discussions is that of 'ordinary' and 'unusual' people. Ordinary is not necessary to explain, it's people like Alyona Ivanovna, the old pawnbroker, or his mother. People who are not destined for anything. But they are unusual like Napoleon Bonaparte. People who are entitled to great goals and make decisions about other lives. Not only that Raskolnikov justifies the murder of the lady, of these "human ears," with higher goals, but we are surprised by the accuracy of his allegation. Is Columbus still a great man if we take into account the number of people killed after the European invasion in America and the number of people still living in the reserves today? If we are going to the extreme, did not Hitler think he was working for a noble goal? These are some of the discussions leaving with the reader long after he finished the piece.

Although it was found out that Raskolnikov was a murderer and that he was sentenced to Siberia to serve his sentence, we cannot say that the end was necessarily tragic. Somewhere between the first and the last page, Raskolnikov meets a prostitute Sonia and falls in love with her. The story of Sonia is also much more complex than it sounds, Raskolnikov first admitted the sins to her, surrender to her begging, and she is the one responsible for Raskolnikov's inner peace that he achieves in the end. Sonia represents love, guides the Raskolnikov's acquaintance with faith and she is the one who reads the Gospel. Through Sonia, Raskolnikov meets God himself, and with the imprisonment in Siberia the novel gets a note of kind of happy ending.
