

Table summarizing the "PISA" in Progress

These findings indicate a consistent trend across all the observations. In response to the same stimulus, children with autism spectrum disorder approached the child, while children without autism avoided the child. In other words, children with autism spectrum disorder were more anxious and more negative, and therefore, approached the stimulus less frequently. Frequency of approach was the most consistent predictor of anxiety across the present study.

Thompson: But obviously the problem is that the government, the executive, changes its mind frequently when particular interests are threatening their programs. But that's another issue. Personally, I think that the Healthcare Act is probably a much better measure of what we want to do than a Medicare act that's been proposed.
