

Chapter 10-Crime and Justice: Periodical Publications

Anytime you see someone break into a house or a car, you might think that the person is committing a crime. In fact, the person may not be a criminal or guilty of breaking into someone else's property. Perhaps the person has permission to break into the house or car to collect the items that were left there.

1. The following situations describe situations where people might commit a crime. Explain why each person might commit a crime in each of the situations.

Robberies

What goes on inside and outside?

Violent Crime

What's a typical situation for someone to commit violence?

Breaking and Entering

Who breaks the law and steals the other person's property to win big money?

2. Many people commit break-and-enter crimes because they want to commit other crimes. Explain why someone might commit break-and-enter crimes.

Consider the following and explain how someone might commit break-and-enter crimes to plan through the following situations. (a) Breaking and entering someone's house after the householder has left the house. (b) Breaking and entering into a gas station after the gas station owner has left the gas station. (c) Breaking and entering into the gas station after the gas station owner has left the gas station.

3. Explain why the criminal goes to the house to break and enter. Explain the main purpose of the criminal.

Homeless People

What's a purpose the homeless have for committing a robbery or breaking and entering into someone's home?

Robberies of property offices

What's a purpose the office manager might commit a robbery?

4. Explain why someone might commit a robbery or a break-and-enter crime to commit other crimes.

Consider the following situations and explain how someone might commit break-and-enter crimes. (a) Committing a robbery or a break-and-enter crime to kidnap someone. (b) Committing a robbery or a break-and-enter crime to collect ransom money. (c) Committing a robbery or a break-and-enter crime to collect a debt.
