• Non-ideal Conditions

It is common in the theory literature to distinguish, between, 'ideal' and 'non-ideal' conditions. These positions correspond roughly to 'normative' and 'descriptive' approaches.

IDEAL CONDITIONS: These judgments are concerned with the consequences of an action if it were carried out in an idealized society, where the people are perfectly benevolent, cooperative, informed, rational, and have identical and stable values and beliefs. The normative theory literature tends to focus on these ideal conditions.

- 1. Distributive justice rules that maximizes overall well-being. Distributive justice goes beyond the idealized theory of justice. Distributive justice requires that the distribution of goods and services is fair and just.
- 2. Justice requires that people are treated fairly and justly. This requires that people are treated fairly and justly. This requires that people are treated fairly and justly. This requires that people are treated fairly and justly. This requires that people are treated fairly and justly.
- 3. Distributive justice requires that people are treated fairly and justly. This requires that people are treated fairly and justly. This requires that people are treated fairly and justly. This requires that people are treated fairly and justly.
- 4. Distributive justice requires that people are treated fairly and justly. This requires that people are treated fairly and justly.
- 5. Distributive justice requires that people are treated fairly and justly. This requires that people are treated fairly and justly.
- 6. Distributive justice requires that people are treated fairly and justly. This requires that people are treated fairly and justly.
- 7. Distributive justice requires that people are treated fairly and justly. This requires that people are treated fairly and justly.
- 8. Distributive justice requires that people are treated fairly and justly. This requires that people are treated fairly and justly.
- 9. Distributive justice requires that people are treated fairly and justly. This requires that people are treated fairly and justly.
- 10. Distributive justice requires that people are treated fairly and justly. This requires that people are treated fairly and justly.

NON-IDEAL CONDITIONS: Distributive justice is concerned with the consequences of an action if it were carried out in a society that is not perfectly benevolent, cooperative, informed, rational, and has identical and stable values and beliefs.

This diagram is a content analysis of a number of ethical judgments. It shows the range of theories and theories in the field of distributive justice.
