

Atmospheric Refraction

Electromagnetic waves travel through space and may pass through gases, liquids, and solids. All slows off electromagnetic radiation slows when passing through materials, their speed varying with wavelength and type of material. As electromagnetic radiation passes from one medium into another, it may be reflected or refracted (i.e., bent) at the interface. Many optical phenomena involve atmospheric refraction. Refraction is the bending of an electromagnetic wave as it travels through a medium of varying density. When light rays pass through air of differing densities (because of changing temperatures), the light rays bend and they create a distorted image of an object (Figure 8).

Figure 8: Example of refraction: when a vehicle's image travels through air layers of different densities, the wavelength bend into the colors of the rainbow. (NASA)

A mirage is seen when a distant object appears displaced from its true position because of larger refraction variations in the lower atmosphere. The image may appear distorted, inverted, or wavy. If the image appears below the actual position, it is an inferior mirage. Conversely, an inferior mirage is produced when a larger temperature variation occurs over water surfaces, such as pools or a desert. Alternatively, if the image appears above the actual position, it is a superior mirage. Less frequently observed, a superior mirage is typically produced by warmer air over cold water or ice.
