the authors' findings are consistent with the results of other studies. For example, a study by Smith et al. (2001) found that the use of a decision support system (DSS) in a medical diagnosis task led to improved performance and reduced errors. Similarly, a study by Jones et al. (2003) found that the use of a DSS in a financial analysis task led to improved performance and reduced errors. The authors' findings also suggest that the use of a DSS in a complex task can lead to improved performance and reduced errors.
