Types of Weathering and Erosion

Earth is constantly changing. Weathering and erosion are two natural processes that affect Earth's features. Both of these are responsible for changing the landscape, but how are they different?

Weathering breaks rocks into smaller pieces, wears down rocks, or changes the color of rocks.

There are three main types of weathering. Physical weathering actually breaks up the rock. One example of physical weathering is when water gets into the cracks in a rock and then freezes. The ice expands. Cracks in the rock get wider. The rock will split apart as this keeps happening. This could mean a piece falls off a rock face on a mountain. Larger boulders are also broken into smaller rocks by this type of weathering. Physical weathering can also be caused by heat from the sun and cooling of temperatures. Rocks expand when they're warmed. They contract when they cool. This cycle of expanding and contracting can make rocks to develop cracks. They eventually crumble. Wind, rain, and waves beating against rocks are also capable of physical weathering.

A rock split by freezing water in Iceland

Biological weathering is caused by living things. Plant roots may slip into cracks in rocks. They rip rocks apart as the roots grow and spread out. This creates smaller pieces. Moss and lichen grow over rock surfaces or inside cracks. This wears down rocks. It may create patterns into them, too. Animals may also cause biological weathering. They burrow cracks in a rock, make it larger, and split the rock. People can weather Earth, too. We wear down paths on the land.
