104	That changes, however, are being made. Thus, in 1974, the Journal of the American Statistical Association introduced a new classifications category section.
105	Thus, it appears that statistical theory has been used more widely than ever before. Perhaps, theory is not the best word for the statistical procedures that are now being used. Perhaps, models is better. However, it is clear that statistical procedures are being used more and more.
106	Thus, there appears to be a clear trend toward theoretical models in statistical procedures. This is not the whole story.
107	Suppose, for example, that a statistician, say, is supposed to test a hypothesis. In this particular situation, the statistician need not necessarily consult with another statistician, and may instead consult with a Quantitative Methodologist .
108	This statistician would be unlikely to consult with this Quantitative Methodologist before beginning to use this particular statistical technique, unless this statistician is quite uninformed .
109	Quantitative methodologists have often emphasized simplicity, and, when the statistician and methodologist consult, the statistician is likely to be told that the particular statistical technique that she or he wishes to use is not simple.
