THE HOLOCAUST:
STORIES OF HIDDEN CHILDREN

During the Holocaust, countless Jewish children faced unimaginable danger. In the final months, hundreds of them and their families, to survive, many children went into hiding, often separated from their loved ones and forced to conceal their true identities. These hidden children lived in attics, basements, and other underground locations, relying on the kindness and bravery of volunteers or family friends who risked their lives to protect them. Their stories are a testament to courage, resilience, and the power of human compassion in the face of extreme adversity.

Hiding meant giving up almost everything: family, friends, and even their own names. Many children were sent to live with non-Jewish families who agreed to protect them, often pretending the children were their own children. Others hid in orphanages, convents, or boarding schools, where they had to keep their Jewish identity a secret. Conditions were often harsh, with little food or clothing, and the constant fear of discovery. In some cases, children spent months or even years in hiding, unable to move freely or go outside.

The survival of hidden children depended on the bravery of rescuers who risked everything to help. These rescuers included individuals, groups, and organizations who provided food, shelter, and protection.
