

Colonial Economics

In the Virginia colony, tobacco was a cash crop and was often referred to as green gold, and was used as money. Farmers, for example, would barter their harvested tobacco for goods and services. Few people had paper money and when to pay for goods and services, therefore, they often purchased needed items on credit, promising to pay their debts when their crops were harvested and sold. They would have to use their savings to pay it off. Since there was little money in the colonies, there were also no banks.
