The Japanese Government's Ministry of Education stated in the country's first computer curriculum in the 1980s that the country had a "strong and sophisticated" computer technology, but that it was not yet able to produce a sufficient number of computer scientists and engineers to take full advantage of the technology in the private sector. In other words, the government was not yet able to produce a sufficient number of computer scientists and engineers to take full advantage of the technology in the private sector.
