

Chapter 18 Notes

Industrialization reshaped class identities, however, and promoted a creative consumer culture. Americans enjoyed cheaper products delivered by global trade and mass production.

Thomas Edison and his colleagues: incandescent lightbulb and phonograph.

P. T. Barnum (1810-1891), who used the country's expanding rail network to develop his famous traveling circus.

Department stores also lured middle-class women by offering tearooms, children's play areas, umbrellas, and clerks to wrap and carry every purchase. Store credit plans enabled well-to-do women to shop without handling money in public.

The rise of electricity, in particular, marked the gap between affluent urban consumers and rural and working-class families. In elite houses, domestic servants began to use — or find themselves replaced by — an array of new devices, from washing machines to vacuum cleaners.

Alexander Graham Bell invented the telephone in 1876

Ida B. Wells refused to get off train in 1884. She sued and won in local courts, but Tennessee's supreme court reversed the ruling.

In 1896, the U.S. Supreme Court settled such issues decisively—but not justly. The case,

Plessy v. Ferguson was brought by civil rights advocates on behalf of Homer Plessy, a New Orleans resident who was one-eighth black. Ordered to leave a first-class car and move to the "colored" car of a Louisiana train, Plessy refused and was arrested. The Court ruled that such segregation did not violate the Fourteenth Amendment as long as blacks had access to accommodations that were "separate but equal" to those of whites. "Separate but equal" was a myth: segregated facilities in the South were flagrantly inferior. Jim Crow segregation laws, named for a stereotyped black character who appeared in minstrel shows, clearly discriminated, but the Court allowed them to stand.

Jim Crow laws applied to public schools and parks and also to emerging commercial spaces.

The Plessy decision remained in place until 1954, when the Court's Brown v. Topeka Board of Education ruling finally struck it down.

The Young Men's Christian Association (YMCA) was one of the earliest and most successful promoters of athletic fitness. Introduced in Boston in 1851, the group promoted muscular Christianity, combining evangelism with gyms and athletic facilities
