Abstract The authors examined the effects of a 10-week, 12-session, group-based, self-help intervention on the self-efficacy and self-management skills of 100 African American women with type 2 diabetes. The intervention was designed to improve self-efficacy and self-management skills by providing information, social support, and problem-solving skills. The results showed that the intervention had a significant positive effect on self-efficacy and self-management skills. The authors discussed the implications of the findings for the development of self-help interventions for African American women with type 2 diabetes.
