These structures are also good for maintaining accountability, control, and achieving organizational goals. There are four basic types of organizational structures: functional, divisional, matrix, and hybrid. These structures are chosen based on the company's size, industry, and specific needs. Functional structures are the most common and are organized by department, such as marketing, sales, and finance. Divisional structures are organized by product or service, such as different brands or regions. Matrix structures combine functional and divisional structures, allowing for more flexibility and coordination. Hybrid structures are a combination of functional and divisional structures, providing the benefits of both. Each structure has its own advantages and disadvantages, and the choice depends on the organization's goals and circumstances.
