

3. Habitat destruction and fragmentation can have many different effects on species.

(a) Describe a characteristic of a specialist species that would make the specialist species more likely to be negatively affected by habitat fragmentation than a generalist species.

A rapidly growing suburban municipality purchases nearby forested land and proposes a newly planned housing development, which would involve clear-cutting much of the area for the construction of single-family homes. While evaluating the land, the development committee discovers that development will encroach upon the habitat of a wood thrush population. The wood thrush is a solitary, territorial bird whose preferred habitat consists of large, intact densely forested areas. Wood thrush populations are also threatened by cowbirds. A cowbird lays her egg in an existing nest of a wood thrush. After the cowbird egg hatches, the cowbird pushes the unhatched wood thrush eggs out. The wood thrush parents raise the cowbird hatchling as their own.

(b) Identify the symbiotic relationship between the wood thrush and the cowbird.

(c) Describe one ecological advantage of leaving areas of undeveloped forest in the development plan as compared to clear-cutting the property.

(d) Propose a solution that will minimize the effect of development on the resident population of wood thrush while still meeting the municipality's need for a housing development.

(e) A male wood thrush needs a minimum of 800m^2 of territory for reproduction. The municipal development committee has set a biodiversity preservation target of 275 male wood thrush territories. Calculate the area that must be set aside to support the goal of 275 male thrush territories. Show your work.

(f) A real estate developer wants to build houses on the property. The plan will support 1,000 lots with a lot size of $1,100\text{m}^2$. The developer has proposed setting aside land equal to 10% of the size of each lot it sells. Calculate the maximum number of male wood thrush territories that could be created under this proposal. Show your work.

(g) Calculate the percentage of each of the 1,000 lots that would need to be set aside in order to support the goal of 275 male wood thrush territories. Show your work.
