

Feudal and Retinue Companies

At the heart of the Hundred Years' War, the royal armies were still assembled using a feudal levy: everyone who held a fief from the king had to render forty days' military service upon demand, with a number of followers determined by the size of their fief. Fighters were grouped under the command of the aristocrat or knight their lordship required by, or under that of a knight-banneret, a knight authorized to franchise a banner or battle. As shown by the size of armies at the start of the fourteenth century, the system provided lots of soldiers – but it also had a lot of flaws. The quality and motivation of men conscripted into obligatory service was very variable, and the best of forty days' service concentrated what could be achieved with them. What's more, since King Philip in the fourth year of the war at the thirteenth century, the king was required to pay them for being called up, which the size of feudal contingents rendered useless.

Over the Hundred Years' War, feudal levies quickly gave way to a new system inspired by English companies without companies. The king commissioned captains to raise companies of volunteers, which means chosen men who were better trained, better equipped and better motivated. Their lower numbers and the Crown less resources, less gaffes, expenses, and revenues had produced a financial emergency situation in which the king demanded to increase – and thus the king of France's ability to maintain large bodies of troops was limited. Finally, the new feudal nature of the model is better responsive to immediate problems. Companies were raised and named for "bachelors", as it was put at the time according to operational and financial requirements. Although some banners were permanent, others only existed for the length of a single campaign.

This battle option represents both the French who shaped together the king of France and those who fought alongside the king of England during the international phase of the Hundred Years' War, these two groups called each other "bachelors" and "bachelors", which gives a sense of how much respect each side had for the other's reputation.

New Marshal is therefore a battle or a company, a knight-banneret, or the captain of an independent company. It is easy to be chosen from the gentry or nobility, though few members of the gentry could rise higher than the rank of captain. They are an accomplished warrior, trained from infancy to fight in armor both on foot and mounted, just like in the medieval and legendary tales of chivalry they were raised with.

The Marshall of your warband are men of arms, professional fighters in heavy armor drawn primarily from the ranks of the nobility. In a feudal company they are your Marshal's cavalry, in an independent company they are volunteers with various roles to them – knights, sergeants, bowmen, sometimes simply warriors in their service. In the start of this period, they primarily fight mounted, relying on speed and a powerful impact to defeat the enemy. However, during the majority of the Hundred Years' War they preferred to fight on foot for fear of the cannon. English archers could wear an unarmored horse with their armor. They use their fight in the thickness of their armor to drive them into battle.

New Marshall will have various costs depending on the period, location, legends, demand, resources of arms. They might be raised who own a small amount of equipment, or knights looking to improve their status through a military career. They were less common than men of arms, and generally fight with horsemen, just as the French may fight mounted, while others carry pikes.

These costs are the costs of your warband. They are generally common fighters, albeit well armored than your warriors. Their reputation of chivalry is the exception, though some legends favor the new raised.
