Welch, 2021 Ranking tasks are a type of interactive formative assessment They allow students to explore a concept by ranking similar situations for a specified variable preferably without computation of that variable I created two sets of introductory astronomy ranking tasks the first connects the Hertzsprung Russell HR diagram and the Stephan Boltzmann luminosity equation the second uses the transit method TM to rank exoplanets by comparing the depth duration and frequency of transits These tasks are designed within the constructivist pedagogical framework They require students to call upon their own relevant schema to establish an assessment rule by which to rank the tasks Any new information encountered in the tasks background or feedback must be actively assimilated or accommodated as students construct mental models of the luminosity relationship and the nature of transiting exoplanets Data driven decision making is at the heart of a good curriculum design process I evaluated students use of the ranking tasks through the think aloud method in which students verbalize without interpreting their cognitive processes This data then directed the improvement of the tasks and the fit of the cognitive model of physics problem solving to the process of ranking These ranking tasks are published online at <https://astro.unl.edu> with many other ranking tasks that are free to use
