These studies, nevertheless, only analyzed strategy rates on a more rudimentary strategy scale across a relatively homogeneous set of children of English and African American parents. Using their information, they attempted to distinguish through a series of differences (gender, the reading frequency of parents, etc.) as to which group of children was more likely to use a particular strategy. The results of the studies, however, are not particularly clear, and the authors conclude that more research is needed.

Following standard epidemiologic conventions, the strategy of the approach outlined by the authors was first described in detail.
