

Employees must answer to the CEO, who is usually responsible for completing the "bottom-line" objectives of the corporation. This may be done in many ways. For example, employees may bring the CEO to attention on completion or being in the completion phase immediately because the information allows them to deal with what's ahead and not be left in a position that's regrettable to the CEO. In the case of a power struggle, it's often necessary. For example, employees may need to bring up a personal responsibility for the corporation, such as the CEO's role in the corporation, or the CEO's role in the corporation, or the CEO's role in the corporation.
