

These findings have important implications for the design of training programs for the construction industry. First, the results suggest that training programs should focus on developing the cognitive skills of workers, particularly in the areas of problem-solving and decision-making. This can be achieved through a variety of methods, including classroom instruction, on-the-job training, and simulation. Second, the results suggest that training programs should also focus on developing the psychomotor skills of workers, particularly in the areas of manual dexterity and coordination. This can be achieved through hands-on training and practice. Finally, the results suggest that training programs should also focus on developing the social skills of workers, particularly in the areas of communication and teamwork. This can be achieved through group activities and role-playing exercises.
