Chapter 1: Introduction to Accounting

- Accounting can be defined as a process of identifying (business transactions), measuring, and communication economic information to users so that they can undertake their decision making process.

- The Accounting Process is compiled of 3 main components which include:

1. Identifying the Business Transaction which is an event that effects an entity's financial position that can be reliably measured and recorded.
2. Measuring the information which is the analysis of the business transactions and recording of the transactions. This component presents us with the information to see the entity's current position and groups together similar items such as income and expenses.
3. The final component is the communication of the financial information and this is primarily done through the Balance Sheet (Statement of Financial Position), Income Statement (Statement of Financial Performance) and the Cash flow statement.

- Through the accounting process both internal and external stakeholders can make decisions once the financial information is effectively communicated.

- Bookkeeping is simply the recording and summarising of financial transactions and the preparation of basic financial reports.

- Bookkeeping differs to accounting as bookkeeping is the simple recording and summarising of financial transactions and preparing of basic financial reports where as accounting is the indentifying of the business transaction as well as measuring and communication the financial information through the Statement of Financial position, statement of financial performance and the cash flow statement.

- Accounting information has a big role in decision making as it affects both the internal (management) and external (investors, banks, suppliers, employees, consumers, govt. authorities, regulatory bodies, community and special interest groups) stakeholders of an entity.

- Accounting information is needed by both internal and external stakeholders which aids them in their decision making process as they usually have a stake or interest in the performance of the entity.

- Some Stakeholders include:

1. Investors: accounting information is important to an investor as it aids them into evaluating the entity's management too see if they were appropriate stewards of the business (aka stewardship function of management). The information could also be used to see whether the business is a worthy investment source that will maximise the investors funds in the future.
2. Suppliers and Banks: accounting information is important to a supplier as this allows them to see whether the entity is generating enough profits to pay for the supplies it receives. Banks need this accounting information as it allows them to see whether the entity is reliable enough to lend money too as they could be not generating the profits needed to get a loan from the bank.
3. Employees: Accounting information is very important to the employees as this will show them if the business is likely to expand and if so what future positions are available that these employees can take advantage off or if any promotions are going to arise.
