These essential characteristics distinguish it from other common filamentous bacteria, which are often characterized by their ability to produce extracellular polymeric substances (EPS) that form a biofilm. The biofilm, which is formed by the aggregation of microorganisms, is usually composed mainly of extracellular enzymes and polysaccharides. These substances are produced by the bacterial population and form a complex network of fibers that bind the cells together. This biofilm is the primary mechanism used by the bacteria to protect themselves from environmental stresses, such as UV radiation, oxygen, and chemicals. It also provides a stable environment for the bacteria to colonize and grow. Filamentous bacteria have the ability to produce extracellular enzymes and EPS. The extracellular enzymes break down complex organic molecules, such as cellulose, into simpler components, which are then used by the bacteria for energy and growth. The EPS, on the other hand, provides a protective layer for the bacteria, which helps them to withstand harsh environmental conditions. These characteristics make filamentous bacteria an important component of the soil ecosystem, as they play a crucial role in the decomposition of organic matter and the recycling of nutrients.
